In 2016, North Korea issued several challenges to President-elect Donald Trump. Its ambassador to the UN, Ja Song Nam, told Trump to end his hostile rhetoric toward North Korea, and its Foreign Minister, Ri Yong Ho, warned that Trump's approach to the North could lead to the "Armageddon." President Trump responded to these warnings. His tweets to the North Korean regime seemed to contradict his campaign rhetoric, his tweets urging “fire and fury like the world has never seen” and threatening that “Military solutions are now fully in place, locked and loaded.” Despite this, North Korea’s nuclear and ballistic missile tests have continued apace. In response, President Trump has released a “Nuclear Posture Review”—a White House document detailing the United States’ strategic nuclear weapons, delivery systems, and war-fighting capabilities. As the world knows from Donald Trump’s presidential campaign and the erratic behavior of his cabinet, he prefers an overly simplistic approach to complex problems. In this case, the overreliance on a nuclear threat is likely to be no more effective than a nuclear weapon—as was demonstrated by Kim Jong Un’s long-range missile test on August 3rd. The American president seems to believe that a nuclear weapon can solve the North Korean nuclear problem. In fact, there are many non-nuclear options available to the United States to pressure North Korea. These could be used to compel the regime to cease the development of its nuclear weapons. These options include sanctions, pressure, and China's economic leverage. The first two can be implemented by the United States, the European Union, and the United Nations Security Council. The latter has the ability to order an oil embargo. The UN
