Before I even knew that I was pregnant with our Little Man, I had already noticed that there are some fundamental differences in how I approach parenthood. Some of these differences are universal, like the "will they/won't they" question, but most of the time they are things that are unique to me and my relationship with my husband. Recently I had the chance to reflect on some of the ways that I have found myself already different when it comes to parenting a second child. 1. We were pretty certain it was going to be a girl When we found out that I was pregnant with Little Man, we didn't know for sure whether it would be a boy or a girl. It was our first child, and most of the time the identity of the baby is pretty obvious. But for some reason, we just knew it was going to be a girl. Maybe it was the name, or maybe it was the feeling of already having two older girls and all of a sudden having a baby that was so close in age. At any rate, we knew that it would be a girl. 2. I am not used to having someone to share this experience with As of this writing, our Little Man is four months old and I have been lucky enough to share this experience with my husband. When we were first trying to get pregnant with Little Man, it was just me and him. Now that we are closer to being parents, I find myself sharing in a way I never expected. I 2d92ce491b
