This should be the way to ask. Feel free to comment. Evaluation of a comparison-type satisfaction questionnaire in patients undergoing surgery for breast cancer. We aimed to assess whether the standard breast-cancer-specific patient satisfaction questionnaire (ABSSQ), currently used in our breast unit, is suitable for use with patients undergoing surgery for breast cancer. The survey design was a cross-sectional questionnaire-based study. Patients were recruited from the surgical waiting room in three university hospitals. The survey was conducted immediately after patients had received written information on their operation and were about to have a discussion with the surgical staff regarding their operation. The questionnaire was divided into seven sections: medical care, technical performance, clinical competence, communication with the staff, personal care, socioeconomic information, and demographic information. Response rates varied from 60.7% to 83.3%. Of all respondents, 82.5% stated that they were satisfied or highly satisfied with their breast operation. An improvement of the new ABSSQ was suggested in only 15 items. The overall mean score of the ABSSQ was higher than that of the general breast-cancer patient satisfaction survey. The results of the present study indicate that the standard ABSSQ can be used for assessment of patients' satisfaction with surgery for breast cancer. Alexander Stirling (politician) Alexander Stirling (1795 – 7 September 1852) was a British Conservative politician.

Stirling was elected as a Member of Parliament (MP) for Leominster at a by-election in 1848, but was unseated on petition in 1849.
