Epigenetic therapy of lung cancer: the future. Epigenetic changes play a role in many cancer hallmarks and these changes are already targeted in anticancer therapy. Epigenetic therapies currently have a limited scope, but have been used successfully in the treatment of hematologic cancers. Nevertheless, none of these therapies have been developed for solid tumors, probably due to the lack of molecular biomarkers for the identification of these tumors. Lung cancer is a highly heterogeneous group of tumors and the current therapies are mostly ineffective. The great recent success with targeting aberrantly methylated genes, such as EZH2, has made lung cancer more amenable to epigenetic therapies than ever before. The targets for these treatments will need to be identified and validated in prospective clinical trials.
